"A City of Cathay" after a scroll of the National Palace Museum (1)

City Wall and Gate

Suburban area around the Great Bridge

Cathay was the name by which North China was known in medieval Europe. The word is derived from Khitay, describing a seminomadic people of Mongolia who conquered a part of Manchuria and northern China in the 10th century AD. During the reign of Genghis Khan (died 1227 AD), the mongols had begun referring to North China as Kitai and South China as Mengli. Kitai is still the Russian word for China. Returning from his long journey, Marco Polo (1254-1324 AD) put the image of Cathay before the European public. His descriptions of a Cathay that possessed a far more sophisticated culture and technology than the contemporary West were circulated throughout the cultural centres and Royal Courts of medieval Europe.
